

Deep Fake Interview Script: Jessica & Liam

Jessica: Hi Liam, it's great to have you here today. How are you doing?

Liam: I'm doing well, thanks Jessica. Happy to be here and excited to talk about our findings.

Jessica: Wonderful! So let's start with the basics—what was the goal of your research into women's happiness?

Liam: We combined the 2021 Women's Happiness dataset with the World Happiness Report. The idea was to see what really drives women's happiness globally—whether it's wealth, health, education, or social support.

Jessica: Interesting. What stood out to you the most when you looked at the data?

Liam: The top-ranking countries, like Finland, Denmark, and Switzerland, weren't just wealthy. They had strong healthcare, education, and gender equality. Social trust and community support made a huge difference.

Jessica: And how about countries that scored lower—was there a pattern there?

Liam: Yes, definitely. In many developing regions, even where GDP was rising, women's happiness lagged behind because of big gaps in healthcare access and political representation. It shows that money alone doesn't guarantee well-being.

Jessica: That's powerful. So if you had to share one key takeaway, what would it be?

Liam: Governments should focus on building social safety nets, equality, and representation. When women thrive, their communities and even entire nations become stronger and happier.
